Suffrage Busto Dispute Ended After 30 Years

Struggle to Get Memorial Into Capitol Closes With Acceptance by Speaker of House, Acting for Congress

Sculptress Breaks Silence

Attitude of Mrs. Catt Explained; One Leader Glad Women Do Not Wage War

By Emma Bugbee

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15.—Statues of three pioneers in the suffrage movement—Lucretia Mott, Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony—were placed in the Capitol of the United States to-night. The ceremonies were the tribute of the women voters of today to the leaders who blazed the way, and as such were participated in by representatives of nearly every prominent woman's organization in the country. They also marked the 101st anniversary of the birth of Susan B. Anthony.

Two hundred suffragists, teachers, mothers, artists, nurses, and even anti-suffragists, joined in a long procession of women robed in white. They placed at the foot of each statue the wreaths contributed by their organizations. The forty-eight states and foreign countries where women are organized were represented symbolically. Miss Jane Addams, of Hull House, presided.

Mrs. Sara Bard Field, of California, presented the statues forming the suffrage memorial, which was formally accepted for Congress by the Speaker, Frederick H. Gillett, who said, in part:

"Our meeting and the presentation of this memorial is symbolic of a change of tremendous significance which has just occurred. The suffrage movement has entered our electorate as equal partners in the great business of government."

"I am happy, therefore, to accept with great gratitude on behalf of the Congress of the United States this national memorial to the pioneers in the suffrage movement in America."

Not Military Heroes

Mrs. Field pledged the services of the women of today to carry on the work of human liberty which the pioneers began.

"With the dedication of these busts of our pioneers there is presented to-night the renewed dedication of the women of today to the great work of a greater freedom which lives before us."

"It makes my heart glad to realize that these busts, the first gift of women to the nation's gallery, represent those who gave life—not took it. And so through their likenesses we are creating the woman's protest against war."

First to place wreaths at the base of the memorial were Mrs. Nora Blatch Barney, of New York, granddaughter of Elizabeth Cady Stanton; Miss Eleanor Anthony, granddaughter of Susan B. Anthony, and Mrs. Cavender Wilcox, granddaughter of Lucretia Mott.

Adele Johnson, behind their silent marble figures lay a strange chapter of the inner history of the suffrage movement.

Opposed by Borglum

It figured not at all in the ceremonies of the unveiling, and might never have come to light but for the publication of a statement from Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, president of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, in connection with her refusal to participate in the ceremonies. Her organization and the Woman's party have been rivals in the task of pushing the Federal amendment through the unwilling doors of Congress, but Miss Alice Paul, chairman of the Woman's party, and those whose auspices the unveiling took place, invited the older body to join with them and other organizations in the presentation of the memorial.

"We thought for once we would do something of which Mrs. Catt would approve," said Miss Paul yesterday.

This is the first time she has been placed or to any personalities in the latter days of the movement, but is a testimonial to the pioneers whom we all venerate. The women of the whole country should join this tribute."

Mrs. Catt, however, took the position that the participation in to-night's exercises would indicate approval of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, of which she was president, gave the original order for the busts thirty years ago to Mrs. Johnson.

"Miss Anthony declared that she would not permit her statue to be made unless it stood beside the statue of Lucretia Mott, who is the mother of us all—those were her very words," said the sculptress.

Lucretia Mott began the whole movement, when she was elected to the world's anti-slavery convention in 1840.

"The busts were ordered from Mrs. Johnson in 1890, in a contract which stipulated that they were to be placed in the United States Capitol. The three members of the original committee died, giving power of attorney to Mrs. Ida Husted Harper to continue the deal with Mrs. Johnson.

"I refused to allow the National American Woman Suffrage Association to have the statues after Miss Anthony died," said Mrs. Johnson, because it was convinced they did not intend to place them in the Capitol. They would put them in a cellar in Warren, Ohio, where their headquarters then were.

"Mrs. Harper finally became convinced, too, last winter that the National American Woman Suffrage Association would not use its influence to place the statues in the Capitol, so she went to Miss Paul and asked her to do it."

Mrs. Paul consulted Powell Minnegrove, head of the Corcoran Institute and Gutzon Borglum, the sculptor, and was advised by them that the statues were worthy to be chosen as memorials. She was a member of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, and she was a member of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, and she was a member of the National American Woman Suffrage Association.
